Abstract

Much of how teachers teach today is based on old pedagogical models. Because there is such a long history in education of children treated as empty vessels to be filled, it is no wonder that changing how educators are allowed to teach takes time, scientific evidence, and support. This talk looks at the most recent research in teaching, learning, creativity, arts education, and cognition, and imagines what schooling and schools could look like. The talk centers on research in embodied cognition to propose a just and contemporary education that our children deserve. A dialogue will follow that provides opportunities for all participants to reimagine schooling.
